

Memorial Day and Veterans Day

By: Kanishk Anil Mogha, Grade 4, Mrs. Csatri

There are many things that can be considered important. One of them is to honor heroes. There is no such thing as selflessness truly. What if what you thought was good would make you sad, make you weak, and harm your loved ones no tell me what you would do. The same thing applies to our heroes. I am positive that if you did something that you felt was right and that society felt was right, no felt that it was a profession that could get you into heaven. But society also didn't appreciate you, how would you feel. This is why we have holidays like Memorial Day to honor our heroes. We need to make the hero's appreciated. The politicians act like they are fighting the battles of the war but they just merely say what they need to to get re-elected, I mean just look at Vietnam the government covered up the number of deaths just so they could dictate more of your life. This is why we need to appreciate the heroes, not the men at the desk deciding more stupid ways to dictate your life but the men and woman who risk their lives for your freedom.

Veteran's Day was created to celebrate the end of the first major world conflict. However, later it became a day to honor all veterans of any war. We should also honor who it was named after, veterans. Who fights our battles. This is what we should honor. Not the politician who managed to get rid of the problem which he created. The idea that we don't think that this makes people more motivated to do their heroic jobs. It's nice to know that you can sit at your house drinking a nice cup of coffee even while your country is at war. This could not be possible if our brave soldiers are not treated like the heroes' that they are. There should be large funerals. These soldiers who die not at their home or hospital but on a foreign soil knowing that there is no hope and that they are not with their loved ones. All that they did is fight for their country. You know more people enlist in rural areas than in urban areas simply because there is less job opportunity. You know war also unites a country and people are willing to die defending their spouses and children. But still, you know while it can be sad for war it states something. That we love our country. We must remember those who have fallen whilst they were saving us from what could be war, that would bring death, destruction, and sadness. But still, we must prevail. For the people we shall honor is not the politician drinking his beer in his villa, but the soldier risking their life.

Even more so, we can't forget the veteran's needs at home. Their needs at home are important because once they are home, and no longer fighting on the front lines for our freedom, they still suffer from the horrors of war. This is also known as a post-traumatic stress disorder, also known as PTSD. Supporting them when they get home reminds them that they are still loved and that people still support them and believe that they are heroes who have helped in combat and suffered the horrors of war, which they still endure. Veterans have served a duty that many others would never think of taking on the task to do, seeing it is such a dangerous job. Citizens of the United States need to help them through their traumas. Those who defended us now need our help. The amount of appreciation needed to help combat the horrors of war should be provided to veterans. It could be stated that is not as important as other people, but I do believe without them a country that is smart enough to have a military would invade us. That would cripple our rights such as free speech. Since the people give the right to the government to make laws and the government gives the military and police the right to enforce laws if the people want to subjugate out something like running around on the street naked the government gives the military the right to enforce that law. So, therefore, the military can also be considered the ones who keep around in society and make sure to protect that common good. We should applaud those willing to keep order in our society; we should not applaud the yes men who just sit around. Keeping order in our society is important and good. I mean could you imagine a society without order. There would be so much murder and bloodshed plus the number of funerals that would happen if it were to come true, your dream of a lawless society.

Speaking of funerals and sadness let's talk about Memorial Day. It is about remembering the soldiers who died while they were protecting your freedom. It should be remembered how people die so young whilst doing something as corsages protecting your freedom. It should be honored those who died protecting your because they looking down from heaven looking at you know that people are still honoring after their courageous sacrifice which was their life. Honoring those who die young in battle need to be remembered because people had a life. Time is infinitely valuable. Let's honor those who lost time defending our freedom. The very need not to honors those who have died is a very stupid Idea considering what they have done for us. It is that we must honor our soldiers.

Well I hope that my article about memorial and veteran's day hopefully convinced you why these holidays are important.
